- Target version set to 3.3.0

This patch works fine on current trunk. I think showing thumbnails in wiki and documents as well as issues can improve consistency and UI/UX.

I know this would be another Feature request. But it's possibly a single line of code and it has something to do with this patch?:

I find the section with the uploaded files in a wiki page usually not so important because the files are mostly images. They get embedded into the page. So I would be happy if this section becomes collapsible and is collapsed by default. But if it gets expanded the thumbnails should be shown.

What do you think about this little enhancement? Look at RedmineProjectOverview as an example - I think the list would better be hidden. The 'New File' could be also included into the collapsed section. The collapsed link element could be just named "Files". With a single click, that does not require a page reload, the file list gets visible again.
