Description
Currently, the user account page seems to show the total instance-wide count of reported issues. This number should be restricted to the projects that the currently logged in user has permissions to, just like the activity view is filtered to their projects.

I'm still able to reproduce this. The count is generated system wide and the list is generated per project. But anyway...
It depends on the software design.

It could be right, to show all issues by this user, regardless if he has acces to them or not, to indicate how much tickets he has created.
This is the current behaviour.

The other way would be to limitate this. But this could lead to the wrong conclusion.
For example: Teamleader A has just access to project a and b and has a discussion with Teamleader B. Teamleader B says, his team has many many tasks to do. Teamleader A don't trust him and watch his userprofiles. He just can't see any reported issues. This way... Teamleader A could ask, if they have ANY work. ;-)

But this is not my decission. Maybe Jean-Philippe could take a look at this and decide if this is by design or more likely a bug.

I like the way it's implemented now, it makes sense to me.
