| On some Redmine installations, the single Redmine instance is used to manage multiple projects. Sometimes the number of the projects and subprojects can be so high, that the project list is very long. If the Redmine administrator himself is participating in some projects, it can be tedious to scroll down the list and try to find the proper project. Same problem is with the project selection combo box in the upper right corner. Proposed solutions: <ol style="list-style-type: none"><li>1. On the PROJECTS page, there should be listed only the projects the current user is member of and public projects.</li></ol> or <ol style="list-style-type: none"><li>2. On the PROJECTS page, there should be by default listed only the projects the current user is member of. There could be a checkbox of some sort, which would add the public projects to the list as well.</li></ol> or <ol style="list-style-type: none"><li>3. On the MyPage, there could be a block available, which would contain the list of projects the current user is member of.</li></ol> |                                  |

Does anyone know of a plugin that do the same thing? I have exactly the same problem, it's really annoying.
